

Dr John Henry Clay

Born in Birmingham in 1980, John Henry Clay spent much of his childhood visiting historic sites and scrambling over ancient ruins. From an early age he was seized by the twin passions of writing and the past, and so eventually decided to combine them in the realm of historical fiction.

He is a keen hiker, having walked the length of both Hadrian's Wall and Offa's Dyke, and was a professional archaeologist before taking up a post teaching early medieval history at Durham University.

THE LION AND THE LAMB 2013 HODDER & STOUGHTON	Condemned to a hovel, beaten by a merciless commander, crushed by the weather and forced to survive on starvation rations: no one looking at Paul would ever guess that he is heir to one of Roman Britain's wealthiest families. But Paul had his reasons for joining the army and fleeing the family he loves. But when rumours of a barbarian uprising from beyond the Wall begin to circulate, Paul realises that his family is in grave danger. With only the former slave-girl Eachna for company, Paul deserts the army, for which the penalty is death, and undertakes a hazardous journey across Britain where danger lurks round every corner. Epic in scope, rich with historical detail, THE LION AND THE LAMB is a novel of Roman Britain on the cusp of the Dark Ages, when all that stands between her citizens and oblivion is one family.
